STATEMENT OF ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether, consistent with the principles of the Agricultural Labor Relations Act, an employer may challenge a union's status as the bargaining representative of its employees by raising a claim of abandonment based on the union's long-term twenty-four year absence or disappearance from the scene, long-term failure to carry out its duties for over twenty-four years, and lack of contact with the employees and the employer over an unreasonably long period of time.

2. Whether state courts should adhere to precedent of the Agricultural Labor Relations Board when to do so would eviscerate important Agricultural Labor Relations Act policy and fundamentally misconstrue the nature and legislative purpose behind such policy.

3. Whether the Agricultural Labor Relations Board should have applied applicable National Labor Relations Board precedent concerning union abandonment.

II.

WHY REVIEW SHOULD BE GRANTED

This is the latest chapter in the long saga of labor relations in the California agricultural industry. This case addresses whether an employer can refuse to bargain with a union that it in good faith believes has forfeited its status as bargaining representative by abandoning a group of employees for over two decades and completely disregarding all statutory obligations. The case provides this Court the opportunity to issue the last word on whether, when enacting the Agricultural Labor Relations Act (“ALRA”), the Legislature did not intend to provide the agricultural employer any defense to bargaining with a certified union in the limited context of long-term total union abandonment that has been recognized under the National Labor Relations Act (“NRLA”). (29 U.S.C. § 185 et seq.)

The question of union abandonment is not an isolated incident limited to the present case. The United Farm Workers (“UFW”) union in recent years has targeted a number of farming operations in the State that have dormant UFW certifications. After decades of noninvolvement, without any explanation or justification, UFW is seeking to upset stable and mutual beneficial working arrangements of these farming operations by asserting that it is the bargaining representative of the employees that it has disregarded for decades.

In J.R. Norton v. ALRB (1979) 23 Cal.3d 1, this Court recognized:

“It is fundamental in statutory construction that courts should ascertain the intent of the Legislature so as to effectuate the purpose of the law. Thus, when administrative rules or regulations alter or amend the statute or enlarge or impair its scope, they are void and courts not only may, but it is their obligation to strike down such regulations.”

(J.R. Norton v. ALRB (1979) 23 Cal.3d at p. 29 (“J.R. Norton”).)

Pursuant to the Legislature’s clear expression of intent, the extreme neglect demonstrated by UFW by completely abandoning a bargaining unit for over twenty-four years, is clearly antithetical to ALRA policy. In enacting the ALRA, the Legislature expressed its intent and the underlying purpose of the Act as to enable agricultural employees to designate “representatives of their own choosing... for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.” (Lab. Code, § 1140.2, italics added.) Labor Code¹ section 1152 restates this purpose and further guarantees to employees the right “to refrain from any or all of such activities” (Lab. Code, § 1152.)

In this case, the Court of Appeal relied on Agriculture Labor Relations Board (“ALRB” or “Board”) precedent that summarily disposed of the employer’s defense of abandonment based on the assertion that the provisions of the ALRA demonstrate that the Legislature must have intended a strict rule prohibiting the employer from participating in deciding whether to bargain with a certified union. Rather than examining the Board’s judicial construction of the ALRA to determine whether it effectuates the stated purpose of the ALRA, the Court of Appeal simply deferred to the Board’s analysis. In doing so, the Court of Appeal failed to recognize the importance of following applicable NLRA precedent as required by California Labor Code section 1148.

The case also provides this Court the opportunity to resolve an important question of law raised by conflicting opinions issued by the appellate courts. Specifically, in Montebello Rose Co. v. ALRB (1981) 119 Cal.App.3d 1 (“Montebello Rose”), the California Fifth District Court of Appeal adopted the rebuttable presumption rule, implying that there may be circumstances under the ALRA in which an employer is permitted to show the union has lost its representative status. (Montebello Rose, supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at p. 24.) In doing so, the Montebello court applied applicable NLRA precedent. In contrast, in F & P Growers Assn. v. ALRB (1985) 168 Cal.App.3d 667 (“F & P Growers”), the California Fourth Circuit Court of Appeal found that in enacting certain provisions of the ALRA, the Legislature must have intended “to prohibit the employer from being an active participant in determining which unit it shall bargain with in cases arising under the ALRA.” (F & P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at pp. 676-677.) These cases demonstrate obvious tensions regarding the role of the employer in the bargaining context warranting this Court’s review. It also leaves unresolved the issue of applicable NLRA precedent and whether it is sound public policy to allow a union to abandon a unit and its statutory duties for twenty-four years.

In what the Court of Appeal referred to as “a companion case” decided on the same day, the Court issued a ruling in Gerawan Farming, Inc. v. ALRB (2015) 187 Cal.Rptr.261 (“Gerawan”). In Gerawan, the employer raised the identical issue asserting union abandonment of its representative status based on its unreasonably lengthy absence and inactivity. Relying on the same Board and appellate court precedent cited in Tri-Fanucchi Farms v. ALRB (2015) 187 Cal.Rptr.247 (“Tri-Fanucchi”), the Court of Appeal determined that the employer in Gerawan was permitted to raise the abandonment theory in the limited context of defending against the initiation of the mandatory mediation and conciliation (“MMC”) process under Labor Code section 1164 et seq. The Court of Appeal’s reasoning to support the distinction is strained and creates several levels of conflict. Review by this Court is necessary to secure uniformity of these decisions.

Petitioner urges this Court to review the decision below, provide the final word regarding the interpretation of the ALRA, and affirm the availability of certain defenses to an employer’s obligation to bargain under the ALRA. Review by this Court is all the more essential because until this case no California court had decided whether a certified bargaining representative can be held to have forfeited their status by long-term abandonment and egregious inactivity.

Petitioner also urges this Court to reaffirm that when the Legislature delegates to an administrative agency enforcement of a statute, its interpretation of the statute shall not be given deference when it is clearly erroneous or alters or amends the statute it is interpreting, or enlarges or impairs its scope. This principle is particularly important where the Legislature has directed the agency to follow applicable NLRA precedent which the agency rejected. The Board's precedent in this case stifles the broad purpose of the ALRA to promote greater stability in labor relations by misinterpreting the important issue of long-term abandonment by the bargaining representative.

This case warrants review.

III.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Petitioner and the United Farm Workers Union

Petitioner Tri-Fanucchi Farms ("Petitioner" or "Fanucchi") is a family-owned farming operation that has been operating in Kern County, California for decades. Petitioner maintains approximately 35 year round employees and hires several hundred seasonal employees through various labor contractors.

In 1977, Fanucchi's agricultural employees elected UFW to be their collective bargaining representative. After UFW was certified as the employees' representative by the Board, the parties engaged in some initial bargaining sessions. After polling its employees and believing they no longer wanted UFW to represent them, Fanucchi refused to bargain with UFW in 1984 on the good faith belief that UFW no longer had majority support. UFW brought an unfair labor practices complaint and the Board held in UFW's favor. The Board's findings were ultimately affirmed by the California Fifth District Court of Appeal.

In 1988, Fanucchi informed UFW that it was willing to engage in bargaining and resume contract negotiations with UFW. UFW responded that it would arrange bargaining dates as soon as its negotiator returned from vacation. For reasons unexplained by UFW, UFW disappeared from the scene and no bargaining occurred for approximately twenty-four (24) years.

The next time UFW contacted Fanucchi was September 28, 2012, when UFW sent a letter demanding that bargaining be restarted and requesting certain information from Fanucchi. Fanucchi responded on October 19, 2012, advising UFW that it believed UFW's 24-year absence resulted in an abandonment of its status as the employees' bargaining representative, that Fanucchi was seeking judicial review of the issue, and that its refusal should be viewed as a "technical refusal to bargain" until such time as the issue of abandonment was addressed by the courts. At this time, Fanucchi's current workforce did not know UFW, did not select UFW to represent the workers' interests, and Fanucchi's employees had no reason to believe UFW represented them due to UFW's 24-year absence.

B. The Proceedings Below

On March 7 and April 16, 2013, UFW filed charges with the Board on the grounds that Fanucchi had allegedly engaged in unfair labor practices by refusing to bargain and by refusing to provide information relevant to bargaining. On September 5, 2013, the Board's general counsel ("General Counsel") filed a consolidated administrative complaint ("Complaint") against Fanucchi, arguing that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain and provide information constituted unfair labor practices in violation of the ALRA, Labor Code section 1153, subdivisions (1) and (e). Additionally, the General Counsel requested the Board award make whole relief against Fanucchi pursuant to the ALRA section 1160.3.

Fanucchi filed an answer to the Complaint on October 8, 2013. The Answer admitted to the underlying facts alleged in the Complaint, but maintained that UFW had forfeited its representative status by completely abandoning the bargaining unit for 24-years. Fanucchi again asserted that its refusal to bargain was in good faith for the purpose of obtaining judicial review of the important labor relations issue of long-term union abandonment.

Before the scheduled hearing by the administrative law judge ("ALJ") on October 21, 2013, the General Counsel submitted a motion in limine requesting that all evidence related to Fanucchi's abandonment defense be excluded on the basis that the defense is not recognized by Board precedent. The ALJ granted the motion in limine, which he treated as a motion to strike or a judgment on the pleadings related to Fanucchi's abandonment defense and related equitable defenses. Having rejected Fanucchi's asserted defenses to the duty to bargain, the ALJ addressed the merits of the Complaint, refused to allow Fanucchi to have a hearing to cross-examine UFW subpoenaed witnesses, and held that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain and turn over information constituted unfair labor practices. The ALJ also found that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain as a means of seeking judicial review was not justifiable in light of Board precedent, and thus awarded make whole relief against Fanucchi.

On November 20, 2013, Fanucchi filed with the Board 15 "exceptions" to the ALJ's decision. On April 23, 2014, the Board issued its decision² in agreement with the ALJ and finding that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain with the UFW and to provide information constituted violations of section 1153, subdivision (a) and (e). The Board denied Fanucchi's contention that UFW's complete abandonment was a defense to its duty to bargain, as well as similar equitable defenses based on the 24-years of total inactivity by UFW. The Board also held that make whole relief awarded against Fanucchi was proper.

On May 23, 2014, Fanucchi filed a petition for writ of review to the California Court of Appeal, Fifth District seeking review of the Board's decision in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4. On February 10, 2015, the Fifth District Court of Appeal issued a writ of review.

The Court of Appeal affirmed the portion of the Board's decision that rejected Fanucchi's defenses to the duty to bargain and held that Fanucchi had committed unfair labor practices for refusing to bargain with UFW and refusing to provide information. The court deferred to the Board's position that past conduct by UFW indicating abandonment – i.e. UFW absence, failure to carry out its duties, and lack of contact with the employees and the employer for more than 24-years – did not create a legal basis for Fanucchi to refuse to bargain with UFW. Adopting the reasoning of the Board, the Court of Appeal concluded that “the appropriate remedy for UFW's past dereliction was (and is) in the hands of the agricultural employees themselves. That is, if the employees do not wish to be represented by UFW, their recourse is to replace or decertify UFW by a new election pursuant to sections 1156.3 or 1156.7.” (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, 187 Cal. Rptr. 3d at 249.)

The Court of Appeal reversed the make whole relief award imposed by the Board against Fanucchi. The Court held that Fanucchi's advancement of the abandonment defense plainly furthered the purpose of the ALRA to promote greater stability in labor relations by obtaining an appellate decision on this important issue, and thus the Board prejudicially erred when it ordered make whole relief against Fanucchi. Fanucchi is not appealing the portion of the decision by the Fifth District Court of Appeal finding that the make-whole remedy was inappropriate. Fanucchi is appealing the lower court's rejection of the abandonment and unclean hands defenses.

C. Companion Case

Gerawan Farming Inc. v. ALRB* (2015) 236 Cal.App.4th 1024

On the same day the court upheld the Board's ruling that total abandonment of the bargaining unit did not create a defense to bargaining, the California Court of Appeal, Fifth District issued a ruling in a companion case Gerawan, recognizing that the same abandonment theory raised by Fanucchi can be raised by the employer in a different context. (Gerawan, supra, 236 Cal.App.4th 1024.) The court held that "where a union requests the Board to order mandatory mediation and conciliation (MMC) under section 1164 et seq., the employer may defend against the MMC request by raising the issue of the union's abandonment of its representative status, including abandonment thereof based on such union conduct as unreasonable lengthy absence or inactivity." (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 249.) After explaining their conclusion and the legal arguments supporting the abandonment theory, the Court went on to conclude that the MMC statute violates equal protection principles and involves an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at pp. 290-299.) As a result, the court set aside the Board's order in Gerawan Farming Inc. (2013) 39 ALRB No. 17.

IV.

LEGAL DISCUSSION

THIS COURT SHOULD REVIEW THE COURT OF APPEAL'S HOLDING THAT LONG-TERM UNION ABANDONMENT & INACTIVITY DOES NOT DEFEAT AN EMPLOYER'S DUTY TO ENGAGE IN BARGAINING WITH THAT UNION

A. The Court of Appeal Erroneously Deferred to the Board's Unreasonable Interpretation and Application of the ALRA.

Instead of adhering to the fundamental and stated purpose of the ALRA, the Court of Appeal deferred to the flawed reasoning of Board precedent which summarily disposed of the issue by holding that a labor organization that is inactive or absent for an extended period of time does not represent a defense to the employer's duty to bargain. (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 255, citing Dole Fresh Fruit Co., Inc. (1996) 22 ALRB No. 4; Pictsweet Mushroom Farms (2003) 29 ALRB No. 3; San Joaquin Tomato Growers, Inc. (2011) 37 ALRB No. 5; Arnaudo Brothers, LP (2014) 40 ALRB No. 3.) In contrast with the fundamental purpose set forth in the ALRA, the Board claimed that "these principles stem from the legislative intent inherent in the ALRA that the power to select and remove unions as bargaining representatives should reside with agricultural employees.” (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 255.) After misinterpreting how California appellate courts have construed the ALRA, the Court of Appeal upheld the Board’s position as a “reasonable interpretation and application of the ALRA.” (Id. at p. 257.)

Although this Court has recognized the principle that an administrative agency is entitled to deference when interpreting policy in its field of expertise, that deference is limited. (J.R. Norton, supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 29.) “A ministerial officer may not . . . under the guise of a rule or regulation vary or enlarge the terms of a legislative enactment or compel that to be done which lies without the scope of the statute and which cannot be said to be reasonably necessary or appropriate to subserving or promoting the interests and purposes of the statute.” (Bearden v. U.S. Borax, Inc. (2006) 138 Cal.App.4th 429, 436 (“Bearden”).) “[W]hen administrative rules or regulations ‘alter or amend the statute or enlarge or impair its scope,’ they ‘are void and courts not only may, but it is their obligation to strike down such regulations.’ [Citations.]” (J.R. Norton, supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 29.) Thus, a Board rule that “eviscerates important ALRA policy and fundamentally misconstrues the nature of and legislative purpose behind” ALRA policy should not be upheld. (Ibid.)

The Board was clearly wrong in its legal conclusion that a defense for long-term complete abandonment is not supported by the purposes and policies of the ALRA. The Board, pursuant to Labor Code section 1148, should have recognized and applied that abandonment defense that has been applied historically by the NLRB. The core legislative purpose of the ALRA is set for in the preamble, which states: “In enacting this legislation the people of the State of California seek to ensure peace in the agricultural fields by guaranteeing justice for all agricultural workers and stability in labor relations. [¶] This enactment is intended to bring certainty and a sense of fair play to a presently unstable and potentially volatile condition in the state.” (Stats. 1975, Third Ex. Sess., ch. 1, § 1, p. 4013.) The policy declaration of the ALRA further provides that a principal purpose of the ALRA is to enable agricultural employees to designate “representatives of their own choosing... for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.” (Lab. Code, § 1140.2, italics added; also see J.R. Norton, supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 30.) Additionally, ALRA policies promote having actual employee representation by the elected union and promoting the collective bargaining relationship. (See, e.g., §§ 1140.2, 1152 & 1155.2, subd. (a).)

The employees’ rights to a representative of their own choosing for the purpose of negotiating a collective bargaining agreement is seriously threatened where, as here, the absent union suddenly appears on the scene after 24-years and demands to engage in collective bargaining as the employees’ legal representative. The UFW disregarded its statutory responsibilities to this bargaining unit for over two decades. Under the circumstances of this case, the reappearing union is by no means a representative of the employees own choosing, but instead is a complete stranger to the employees. The union wholly disappeared from the scene, did not carry out any statutory duties, and made no contact with the employees and the employer for over two decades. Under the rigid rule imposed by the Board, the employer is required to bargain with the long-term absent union, whether the employees want the union's representation or not. Thus, the Board's rule does not promote the ALRA's interest in providing the employees the right to "bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing" (Lab. Code, § 1152), but instead undermines the important ALRA purpose of protecting the employees' right to choose and upsetting a 24-year stable working relationship. The rule also fails to consider that the Fanucchi's current workforce does not know UFW, did not select UFW as their representative, and had no knowledge that they were represented by any union, much less UFW. Nor did the Board require UFW to justify its actions of abandoning the unit for twenty-four years.

The Court of Appeal further adopted the Board's reasoning that under the circumstances of this case, the only recourse for employees who did not wish to be represented by the stranger union was to replace or decertify UFW by a new election pursuant to sections 1156.3 or 1156.7.

(Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 249.) Again, this application of the ALRA is antithetical to the important interest of the agricultural workers for which the Act seeks to protect. The UFW has been entirely absent from the scene and had no contact whatsoever with the employees or the employer for over 24-years. Thus, the employees are at a great disadvantage because they have no relationship with the union to base a decision on whether or not to seek decertification. The employees will need to disseminate information, organize a decertification drive, petition for and hold an election and obtain the Board's certification in order to remove UFW. Further, as demonstrated in the Gerawan case, it is likely that UFW will immediately invoke the MMC process long before the employees would be able to stop it by pursuing decertification. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 287.) The result would be the implementation of a contract the employees never voted on or ratified. (Ibid.)

The Board itself has recognized the proposition where a union can be held to have abandoned its certification or representative status, however limited. The Board has adopted the principle that abandonment by the union takes place where the union is either unwilling or unable to continue its responsibilities to the bargaining unit. (Dole Fresh Fruit Co, supra, ALRB No. 4, pp. 12-14; Bruce Church, Inc. (1991) 17 ALRB No. 1, p. 13.) However, the Board set narrow grounds for finding abandonment to situations involving either an express disclaimer by the union or union defunctness. (San Joaquin Tomato Growers, Inc., supra, 37 ALRB No. 5, p. 4, Dole Fresh Fruit Co, supra, ALRB No. 4, pp. 12-14; Bruce Church, Inc., supra, ALRB No. 1, p. 13.) The Board's rigid limitations on the factual grounds for abandonment are arbitrary. As demonstrated here, there is other union conduct that supports a finding of abandonment. In fact, the inherent policy underlying the ALRA demands a finding of abandonment when a union disappears for decades and disregards all statutory responsibilities to the employees it purports to represent.

Rather than relying on the text of the ALRA as the best indicator of legislative purpose (Brinker Restaurant Corp. v. Superior Court (2012), 53 Cal.4th 1004, 1026), the Board relied on its own construction of the ALRA to conclude that the "legislative intent inherent" in the ALRA provides that "the power to select and remove unions as bargaining representative should reside with agricultural employees and not with their employers." (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 255.) To reach this outcome, the Board noted provisions of the ALRA that "indicated" that the Legislature did not intend for an agricultural employer to participate in deciding whether or not it shall bargain with a particular union. (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, ALRB No. 4.) The Board noted that the ALRA only allows an employer to bargain with a union that has won an election, as opposed to the NLRA that permits the employer to bargain with any union that demonstrates by any means that it has majority status. Secondly, the ALRA does not allow employers to file election petitions regarding certification or decertification of a union, in contrast to the NLRA which allows employers to petition for an election. (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, ALRB No. 4.) Although these provisions of the ALRA place distinctive limits on the employer in the collective bargaining process, it does not follow that the Legislature intended that the employer should be removed completely from the decision of whether to bargain with a union if in good faith it believes the union forfeited its status as the employees' bargaining representative after 24-years of complete abandonment.

The Board's blanket rule that past union absence or inactivity does not create an abandonment defense to the duty to bargain exceeds the scope of the authority conferred to it by the Legislature. (Bearden, supra, 138 Cal.App.4th at p. 436 ["A ministerial officer may not . . . under the guise of a rule or regulation vary or enlarge the terms of a legislative enactment..."].) Although the ALRA holds that an employer can only bargain with a union that has won an election and cannot file an election petition, the Board's general rules and strict interpretation far exceed the terms of the statute and the restrictions on employers in the context of bargaining. As such, the Court of Appeal and this Court are obligated to strike down the ALRB's rule denying Fanucchi's abandonment defense to its obligation to bargain with UFW. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at

p. 29 [courts have an obligation to strike down administrative rules that enlarge the scope of the legislative enactment].)

B. The Court of Appeal Misconstrued Legal Precedent Interpreting the Judicial Construction of the ALRA.

In trying to ascertain the intent of the ALRA, the Court of Appeal erroneously applied the reasoning of California appellate cases to find support for the Board's strict application that abandonment, even long-term, is never a defense to the duty to bargain. The Court of Appeal's reasoning is flawed and does not comport with the intent of the ALRA.

The Court below relied on the theory advanced by the Board "that an employer's duty to bargain with the originally certified union continues until that union is replaced or decertified by a subsequent election." (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at 255 [emphasis in original].) Accordingly, the Court of Appeal reasoned, "if a certified union's neglect or inaction causes the agricultural employees to be dissatisfied with that union, the appropriate remedy is for the employees to pursue a decertification election." (Ibid.)

The leading decision construing the meaning and implications of a union's certification status under the ALRA is Montebello Rose, supra, 119 Cal.App.3d 1. Contrary to the lower court's analysis, the decision in Montebello Rose does not support the application of the rule that the employer's duty to bargain with the originally certified union continues until that union is removed by the employees to the circumstances of the present case. Instead, Montebello Rose recognized that there may be circumstances in which an employer is permitted to demonstrate that the union has forfeited its representative status.

In Montebello Rose, the Fifth District Court of Appeal addressed the issue of “whether an employer’s duty to bargain with a certified employee representative continued beyond the initial certification year absent an extension of the certification period as provided in section 1155.2, subdivision (b) ...” (Montebello Rose, supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at p. 6.) The Fifth District rejected the employer’s argument that it no longer had a duty to bargain with the union because the one-year certification period under section 1155.2 had expired and no extension had been issued. (Id. at pp. 23-24.)

In reaching this conclusion, the Fifth District adopted the reasoning of the NLRA precedent that held after the expiration of the initial year of certification, there was a rebuttable presumption that a certified union continued to enjoy majority support. (Montebello Rose, supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at p. 24.) The court recognized that since no section of the ALRA negated this rule, the presumption of a union’s continuing status would therefore be applicable to the ALRA. (Ibid.) The Montebello Rose court reached this decision despite the fact that the ALRA had different language regarding the certification process and provided for an extension of certification, whereas the NLRA did not. (Ibid.)

The significance of the Montebello Rose case is that the court acknowledged the existence of a rebuttable presumption rule under the ALRA statutory scheme. Montebello Rose necessarily implies that circumstances may exist that would permit an employer to demonstrate that the union has lost its representative status. Fanucchi contends that such circumstances exist in the present case where UFW abandoned the bargaining unit for 24-years, during which time it completely disregarded all of its statutory obligations as bargaining representative under the ALRA.

The Court of Appeal inexplicably afforded the rebuttable presumption it acknowledged in Montebello Rose no legal significance. Instead, the lower court relied on the flawed analysis of the California Fourth District Court of Appeal in F & P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d 667 which addressed the issue of whether the rebuttable presumption rule may be used by an employer as a basis for refusing to bargain with a union it believed in good faith had lost its majority support.

In F & P Growers, the employer refused to continue bargaining with a union that had limited contact with its employees for approximately three years on the basis that “objective criteria revealed that a majority of employees in the bargaining unit no longer supported the UFW ...” (F & P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at 670.) The employer argued that since the NLRA's rebuttable presumption rule had been found applicable to the ALRA, the NLRA loss-of-majority support defense was also applicable under the ALRA. (Id. at p. 672-677.) The F & P Growers court rejected the employer's contention, and found that the loss-of-majority support defense to bargaining with a particular union was clearly inapplicable to the ALRA based on specific differences between the ALRA and NLRA. (Id. at 674-676.) The Court noted that the ALRA only allows an employer to bargain with a union that has won an election, as opposed to the NLRA that permits the employer to bargain with any union that demonstrates by any means that it has majority status. Additionally, the ALRA does not allow employers to file election petitions regarding certification or decertification of a union, in contrast to the NLRA which allows employers to petition for an election. (Id. at p. 676.) The court in F & P Growers reasoned that these distinctions in the ALRA indicated "a purpose on the part of the Legislature to prohibit the employer from being an active participant in determining which unit it shall bargain with in cases arising under the ALRA." (Id. at pp. 676-677.) Thus, the F & P Growers court concluded it would "not permit the agricultural employer to do indirectly, by relying on the NLRA loss of majority support defense, what the Legislature has clearly shown it does not intend the employer to do directly." (Id. at p. 677.)

In concluding that an employer could not refuse to bargain with a certified union based on a claimed defense of loss of majority status, the F

& P Growers court recognized that the reasoning they applied should not be strictly construed to mean that there are no circumstances under the ALRA that would support an employer defense to the duty to bargain. The court explained:

“While it does not follow inexorably that the agricultural employer’s good faith belief is not a defense for the refusal to bargain just because the Legislature prevented an agricultural employer from electing a union or from filing a decertification petition, nor is such a conclusion demanded by purely syllogistic reasoning, it does appear that the Legislature’s purpose in enacting the ALRA was to limit the employer’s influence in determining whether or not it shall bargain with a particular union.”

(F & P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at p. 676.) This analysis demonstrates that the court construed provisions of the ALRA to find that Legislature’s purpose was to “limit employer influence” in determining whether to bargain with a union, rather than a strict rule prohibiting the employer from ever challenging the status of a union as bargaining representative. (Ibid.)

Additionally, the court in F & P Growers acknowledged the holding in Montebello Rose Co., supra, 119, Cal.App.3d 1, and without rejecting its reasoning, simply stated that the court in that case recognized the right of employees, not employers, to petition for an election. (F & P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at p. 677.) In doing so, the court in F & P Growers necessarily endorsed Montebello Rose’s adoption of the NLRA rebuttable presumption rule, implying that there may be circumstances under the

ALRA in which an employer is permitted to show the union has lost its representative status. (Montebello Rose, supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at p. 24.)

The lower court mistakenly found Fanucchi's abandonment defense to be "clearly analogous" to the loss of majority defense asserted by the employer in F & P Growers, and summarily disposed of the issue. (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p. 257.) In doing so, the Court of Appeal validated the Board's erroneous rule that past union absence or inactivity, regardless of how long, does not create an abandonment defense to the employers' duty to bargain. As a result, in direct conflict with the basic purpose of the ALRA, certified unions that have completely abandoned the bargaining unit they were elected to represent for decades are now permitted to invade and disrupt a stable and well developed relationship between the employees and their employer without employee input. The ruling also unfairly burdens the employees to decertify a union that the current workforce did not choose, and may not even know is their representative. Such a rule clearly seeks to protect the union, not the employees. The UFW should be held accountable for its twenty-four years of abandoning its statutory duties and should be required to account for its misconduct.

This Court's review is required. The Court of Appeal's holding in this case fails to effectuate the purpose of the ALRA and plainly misconstrues the intent of the Legislature. It allows unions to abandon their statutory duties with impunity.

C. The Court of Appeal Created Significant Discord In Case Law

Review by this Court is all the more essential because the Court of Appeal's holding in the Gerawan case conflicts with the holding in the present case and creates ambiguity in the case law regarding the defense of abandonment. In Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d 261, decided the same day as Tri-Fanucchi, the Court of Appeal held that an employer could raise the same theory of abandonment raised by Fanucchi as defense to a union's request to initiate the mandatory mediation and conciliation ("MMC") process under section 1164 et seq. In a very strained analysis, the lower court attempted to reconcile the clear discord between the Gerawan and Tri-Fanucchi on two grounds: 1) the Court of Appeal asserted that the MMC process was a distinct legal procedure that is imposed on the parties without their consent, and therefore the employer's continuing duty to bargain was not an obstacle to raising abandonment at that stage; and 2) where a long-absent union returned to the scene and requested the MMC process, there would not be adequate opportunity for the employees to exercise a decertification option if they did not want to be represented by that union, thereby thwarting the employee's fundamental statutory right to choose. (Tri-Fanucchi, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.3d at p.250.) These arbitrary distinctions are unreasoned and create an unnecessary discrepancy on this important legal issue.

The procedural history in Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 261 really illustrates the significance of the abandonment issue. The facts in Gerawan and Tri-Fanucchi are similar in that in both cases UFW abandoned the agricultural employees for long periods of time before bursting back onto the scene and demanding the employees and employers recognize it as the bargaining representative for the employees. In contrast to Tri-Fanucchi, in Gerawan the employer and UFW had actually engaged in an introductory negotiating session in 1992 before UFW disappeared from the scene for nearly 20 years. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 at p. 267.)

The significant difference between Gerawan and Tri-Fanucchi is that Fanucchi has always maintained that UFW forfeited its status as bargaining representative of its employees due to its long-term disregard to its statutory responsibilities, and thus refused to bargain with UFW until the issue of UFW's abandonment was settled by a court of law. In contrast, Gerawan recognized UFW as bargaining representative of its employees, and engaged in bargaining sessions with UFW after its reappearance in late 2012. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 at pp. 266-267.)

After only a few months of bargaining, UFW sought an order from the Board, which the Board issued, referring the parties to the MMC process pursuant to section 1164 et seq. The parties exhausted the voluntary mediation process pursuant to the MMC process without any agreement being reached on the terms of a CBA. After holding a series of hearings, the mediator crafted the CBA. Following a series of objections, the Board eventually adopted the mediator's proposed CBA, thereby establishing it as the first CBA between the parties. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 at pp. 267-268.)

While the MMC was in process, the Gerawan employees held an election to decide whether to decertify UFW as their bargaining representative. The Board impounded the ballots after claims of misconduct relating to the election, and the ballots still have not been counted. The Board denied Gerawan's request to stay the MMC proceedings until the outcome of the election was known. Thus, when the Board approved the mediator's CBA, it was unknown whether the agricultural employees had in fact voted to remove UFW as their bargaining representative. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 at p. 268.)

Relying on the same Board and appellate court precedent it held precludes Fanucchi from asserting the abandonment defense in the context of bargaining, the Court of Appeal held in Gerawan that an employer can raise the abandonment defense in the context of objecting to the union's request to institute the MMC process. (Gerawan, supra, 187 Cal.Rptr.39 at pp. 285-289.)

The court below relied upon the distinction between an employer who affirmatively refuses to bargain with a union and an employer who seeks to defend itself against a union's demand to commence the MMC process. But it ignored the underlying issue – in each context, the employer is seeking to challenge the union's representative status. Whether that assertion is made as a defense to bargaining or as a defense to the MMC process, the conclusion is the same; either the union is or is not the rightful bargaining representative of the agricultural employees at issue. If the union is not the bargaining representative of the agricultural employees, then negotiating a CBA that will be enforced against said employees, whether reached voluntarily between the union and the employer, or compelled, would contravene the underlying purpose of the ALRA to protect the rights of agricultural workers.

The inherent conflict between the holding in Tri-Fanucchi and Gerawan is best illustrated by examining the consequences. If the employer is successful at defending initiation of the MMC proceedings by demonstrating the union forfeited its status as bargaining representative by abandoning the bargaining unit, is the employer obligated to continue bargaining sessions with the union? Pursuant to the underlying purpose and intent of the ALRA, the legal conclusion would be “no” as the union is not a representative of the agricultural employees' own choosing. Consequently, pursuant to the analysis set forth in Tri-Fanucchi, the employer is obligated to bargain with this union nonetheless. As demonstrated here, the principles announced by the Court of Appeal in these companion cases are not harmonious and create substantial uncertainty for agricultural employees, employers, and unions alike.

This Court should grant the petition for review to reaffirm the broader purpose of the ALRA to promote greater stability in labor relations by offering clarification and confirmation on this important issue. Ultimately, it is this court that must ascertain the intent of the ALRA so as to effectuate the purpose of the Act. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 29.)

V.

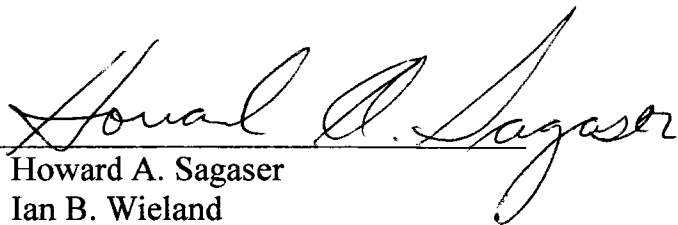

CONCLUSION

This case provides this Court the opportunity for the first time to determine whether in enacting the ALRA the Legislature intended to deprive the agricultural employer from asserting a defense to bargaining with a certified union in the limited context of long-term total union abandonment. Petitioner respectfully requests the Court grant this petition for review and reaffirm the Legislature's stated purpose in enacting the ALRA to protect agricultural employee's right to choose their representative and to promote greater stability in labor relations. Review by this Court is necessary in order to secure uniformity of the various conflicting appellate court cases regarding this important issue.

Petitioner also urges this Court to reaffirm that when the Legislature delegates to an administrative agency enforcement of a statute, its interpretation of the statute cannot be upheld when it is clearly erroneous or alters or amends the statute its interpreting, or enlarges or impairs its scope. Review by this Court is all the more necessary in the present case where the Legislature has directed the agency to follow applicable NLRA precedent.

Tri-Fanucchi Farms (Fanucchi) is an agricultural employer conducting farming operations in Kern County. In 1977, Fanucchi's agricultural employees elected the United Farm Workers union (UFW) to be their exclusive bargaining representative. However, for reasons UFW has not explained, no bargaining occurred between 1988 and 2012, a period of 24 years. In 2012, UFW contacted Fanucchi and requested the recommencement of bargaining. Fanucchi refused to bargain with UFW on the ground that, because of the 24-year hiatus, UFW had abandoned Fanucchi's agricultural employees. A complaint was then filed against Fanucchi for unfair labor practices, and the matter was referred to an administrative law judge (ALJ). Ultimately, the Agricultural Labor Relations Board (the Board) upheld the determinations of the ALJ that (i) abandonment and similar equitable theories were not available as defenses to the duty to bargain under the Agricultural Labor Relations Act (Lab. Code, § 1140 et seq.,¹; the ALRA) and (ii) make whole relief was appropriate under the circumstances. (See Tri-Fanucchi Farms (2014) 40 ALRB No. 4.) Fanucchi then petitioned this court for review of the Board's decision in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4 and we agreed to review the matter.

The primary issue raised in the petition is whether UFW's past conduct indicating abandonment—namely, its failure to bargain for 24 years—gave Fanucchi a legal basis to refuse to bargain with UFW once that union returned and sought to recommence bargaining. We affirm the Board's position that such facts did not create a defense to bargaining or excuse Fanucchi from its obligation as employer to bargain in good faith with UFW. Rather, in the instant context, the appropriate remedy for UFW's past dereliction was (and is) in the hands of the agricultural employees themselves. That is, if the employees do not wish to be represented by UFW, their recourse is to replace or decertify UFW by a new election pursuant to sections 1156.3 or 1156.7.

We preface our opinion with a brief comment on the broader issue of abandonment. In a companion case decided on the same day herewith, Gerawan Farming, Inc. v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (May 14, 2015, F068526/F068676) ___ Cal.App.4th ___, we have concluded that where a union requests the Board to order mandatory mediation and conciliation (MMC) under section 1164 et seq., the employer may defend against the MMC request by raising the issue of the union's abandonment of its representative status, including abandonment thereof based on such union conduct as unreasonably lengthy absence and inactivity. One reason we concluded that such an abandonment theory could properly be raised by the employer in that limited context was the fact that the statutory MMC process is not a mere extension of voluntary bargaining, but is a distinct legal procedure that results in an imposed collective bargaining agreement (CBA) without the parties' consent, on terms dictated by a mediator and ordered by the Board. (§§ 1164, subd. (d), 1164.3.) Since to a substantial degree the MMC process leaves consensual bargaining behind, we held that the employer's continuing duty to bargain was not an obstacle to raising abandonment at that stage. Another reason we allowed the employer to raise abandonment in that context was a recognition that, where a long-absent union returned to the scene and requested the MMC process, in general there would not be an adequate opportunity for employees to exercise a decertification option if they did not want to be represented by that union. Moreover, as more fully explained in said companion case, we concluded that allowing such a theory to be raised in response to a union's MMC request was the only way to preserve the employees' fundamental statutory right to choose.

Here, in contrast to the above described companion case, the parties' dispute arose out of the ordinary bargaining context. The MMC process was not invoked. Fanucchi simply refused to bargain with UFW on the ground of the alleged abandonment. As noted above, we conclude that UFW's lengthy period of inactivity did not defeat Fanucchi's duty to engage in bargaining with that union upon request. Accordingly, we affirm the portion of the Board's decision in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4 that rejected Fanucchi's defenses to the duty to bargain and held that Fanucchi committed unfair labor practices under section 1153, subdivisions (a) and (e), for refusal to bargain with UFW and refusal to provide information. However, for reasons that will be more fully explained below, we reverse the portion of Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4 wherein the Board imposed make whole relief against Fanucchi. Such relief was not appropriate in this case because Fanucchi's pursuit of judicial review of the abandonment issue provided needed clarification on that important legal question affecting labor relations under the ALRA.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Fanucchi is a family-owned farming enterprise in Kern County, California, that grows and harvests a variety of crops, including carrots, cotton, tomatoes, garlic, onions and wine grapes. Fanucchi maintains approximately 35 yearround employees and hires several hundred seasonal employees through various labor contractors. In 1977, an election by secret ballot was held by Fanucchi's agricultural employees and UFW was voted by them to be their collective bargaining representative. The election of UFW as the employees' representative was certified by the Board at that time.

Some initial bargaining sessions occurred after UFW was certified. However, based on a poll of its employees in the early- to mid-1980's, Fanucchi believed they no longer wanted UFW to represent them. In 1984, Fanucchi refused to bargain with UFW based on an alleged good faith belief that UFW no longer had majority support and also based on alleged union abandonment of the bargaining unit and related equitable defenses. UFW then brought an unfair labor practices complaint against Fanucchi and the Board held in UFW's favor. Fanucchi filed a petition for review of the Board's decision. In a nonpublished opinion issued by this court in 1987, we rejected each of Fanucchi's claimed defenses and affirmed the Board's findings that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain was an unfair labor practice. (Tri-Fanucchi Farms v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (Nov. 21, 1987, F008776) [nonpub. opn.]²)

In 1988, Fanucchi informed UFW that it was willing to bargain. According to Fanucchi, UFW responded in 1988 that it would arrange bargaining dates as soon as its negotiator returned from vacation. However, UFW failed to follow through and no bargaining dates were ever scheduled. The next time UFW contacted Fanucchi was 24 years later by letter dated September 28, 2012, wherein UFW requested that bargaining be restarted and asked for certain information from Fanucchi relevant to bargaining. Fanucchi responded by letter of October 19, 2012, stating that it was refusing to bargain with UFW on the ground that UFW had abandoned the bargaining unit and was “no longer the valid collective bargaining representative of [Fanucchi’s] employees.” Fanucchi’s letter also advised that it was seeking judicial review of the abandonment issue—an issue that had not yet been specifically addressed by the courts—and Fanucchi insisted that its refusal should be viewed by UFW as a “technical refusal to bargain” to facilitate such judicial review. Along these lines, Fanucchi asked UFW to agree to expedited proceedings based on stipulated facts, but UFW was not willing to proceed in that manner.

On March 7 and April 16, 2013, UFW filed charges with the Board’s regional office in Visalia alleging that Fanucchi was engaging in unfair labor practices by refusing to bargain and by refusing to provide information relevant to bargaining. On September 5, 2013, the Board’s general counsel (the General Counsel) filed a consolidated administrative complaint (the Complaint) against Fanucchi, claiming that Fanucchi’s conduct constituted unfair labor practices in violation of section 1153, subdivisions (a) and (e) of the ALRA,³ and requesting that the Board award make whole relief for the benefit of the employees (§ 1160.3).

² We grant the Board’s request for judicial notice of this prior nonpublished opinion. We do not rely on it as precedent, but merely refer to it as a part of the historical background to the present case.

On October 8, 2013, Fanucchi filed an answer to the Complaint. Fanucchi's answer admitted to the material underlying facts, but claimed as a defense to the duty to bargain that UFW abandoned its representative status and/or had unclean hands and/or was barred by laches, all because of the 24-year period of UFW inactivity. Further, the answer reiterated that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain was in good faith for the purpose of obtaining judicial review of an important labor relations issue (i.e., union abandonment).

A hearing of the case was scheduled for October 21, 2013, before ALJ Thomas Sobel. Prior to the hearing, the General Counsel filed a motion in limine with the ALJ requesting the exclusion of all evidence relating to Fanucchi's abandonment defense on the ground that such a defense to an employer's duty to bargain was not recognized under established Board precedent. The ALJ granted the motion in limine, which he regarded as in substance a motion to strike or a judgment on the pleadings relating to Fanucchi's abandonment defense and the related equitable defenses premised on the 24-year hiatus. The ALJ held that even if the facts Fanucchi sought to prove were true, they did not establish a defense to bargaining; therefore, the motion was granted.

Having rejected Fanucchi's claimed defenses to the duty to bargain, the ALJ proceeded to consider the merits of the Complaint in light of Fanucchi's answer, which had admitted to the material factual allegations. The ALJ found that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain, etc., constituted unfair labor practices. On the issue of whether to award make whole relief, the ALJ found that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain as a means of seeking judicial review was not justifiable because the Board's precedents were very clear that purported abandonment based on past union inactivity was not a defense to a current request to bargain by the same union. Therefore, the ALJ found that Fanucchi's efforts to obtain judicial review of a "settled" labor issue did not further the purposes of the ALRA. Consequently, the ALJ held that make whole relief should be awarded against Fanucchi.

The ALJ's written decision was transferred to the Board. On November 20, 2013, Fanucchi filed with the Board 15 "exceptions" to the ALJ's decision. Among other things, the exceptions challenged the ALJ's decision to treat the motion in limine as a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the ALJ's rejection of Fanucchi's abandonment and related equitable defenses, the ALJ's refusal to take evidence concerning those defenses, and the ALJ's decision to award make whole relief.

On April 23, 2014, the Board issued its decision, which was reported at Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4. The Board found, in agreement with the ALJ, that Fanucchi's refusal to bargain with UFW and to provide information constituted violations of section 1153, subdivisions (a) and (e). The Board rejected Fanucchi's contention that a defense existed to its duty to bargain based on the alleged abandonment on the part of UFW. The Board likewise rejected the similarly framed equitable defenses of laches, estoppel and unclean hands based on the same 24-year bargaining hiatus. The equitable claims were also rejected on the additional ground that there was no prejudice or harm caused to Fanucchi. On the question of whether make whole relief was proper, the Board expressed that because there was already established Board precedent rejecting the abandonment theory, "[Fanucchi's] position cannot be said to further the policies and purposes of the ALRA." (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, p. 18.)

Accordingly, the Board agreed with the ALJ that make whole relief was appropriate.

Fanucchi filed a petition to this court seeking our review of the Board's decision in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4. We issued a writ of review.

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review

The issues raised by Fanucchi are legal, primarily involving the interpretation of the ALRA and the question of the availability of certain defenses to an employer's statutory duty to bargain under the ALRA. Integral to these questions are the basic legislative purposes and policies of the ALRA. Since the Board is the administrative agency entrusted with enforcement of the ALRA, its interpretation of the ALRA is given deference by the courts and will be followed if not clearly erroneous. (Montebello Rose Co. v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (1981) 119 Cal.App.3d 1, 24 (Montebello Rose)). Nevertheless, it is fundamental in statutory construction that courts should ascertain the intent of the Legislature so as to effectuate the purpose of the law. (J.R. Norton Co. v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (1979) 26 Cal.3d 1, 29 (J.R. Norton Co.); Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Com. (1941) 17 Cal.2d 321, 326 [courts state the true meaning of a statute finally and conclusively].) Thus, while an administrative agency is entitled to deference when interpreting policy in its field of expertise, it cannot alter or amend the statute it is interpreting, or enlarge or impair its scope. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, at p. 29; Adamek & Dessert, Inc. v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (1986) 178 Cal.App.3d 970, 978 (Adamek & Dessert)).

II. ALRA Statutory Overview

The issue of whether abandonment or other equitable theories may be raised as a defense to bargaining requires an understanding of the statutory provisions and main purposes of the ALRA. We therefore begin with a brief overview of the ALRA.

In 1975, the California Legislature enacted the ALRA "to provide for collective-bargaining rights for agricultural employees" (§ 1140.2) by putting into place a system of laws generally patterned after the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 151; the NLRA). (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 8.) The ALRA declares it is the policy of the State of California "to encourage and protect the right of agricultural employees to full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing ... for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.” (§ 1140.2.)⁴ As noted by our Supreme Court, “[a] central feature in the promotion of this policy is the [ALRA’s] procedure for agricultural employees to elect representatives ‘for the purpose of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.’ (Id., § 1156 et seq.)” (J.R. Norton Co., supra, at p. 8.)

Under that election procedure, if a proper petition has been filed, the Board directs that an election be held by a secret ballot vote of employees to determine an issue of employee representation, such as whether a particular labor organization shall be the employees’ bargaining representative.⁵ (§§ 1156, 1156.3.) Except in certain runoff elections, every ballot “shall provide the employee with the opportunity to vote against representation by a labor organization by providing an appropriate space designated ‘No Labor Organizations.’” (§ 1156.3, subd. (c).) After the election, the Board “shall certify” the result unless it determines based on a sustained election challenge “that there are sufficient grounds to refuse to do so.” (§ 1156.3, subd. (e)(2) [stating grounds for such refusal].)

If a labor organization (i.e., a union)⁶ is certified as the winner of such an election and thus becomes the employees’ bargaining representative, certain legal consequences follow. First, a statutory bar exists to holding another representation election for at least the initial one-year certification period. (§§ 1155.2, subd. (b), 1156.5, 1156.6.) Second, a duty to bargain is created, which is owed by the employer to the union and vice versa.

⁴ The same employees also have the right “to refrain from any or all such activities” (§ 1152.)

⁶ The terms “union” and “labor organization” are used synonymously herein.

(§§ 1153, subd. (e), 1154, subd. (c), 1152.) However, unlike the election bar, the duty to bargain does not expire with the initial one-year period. That is because a union's status as the employees' certified bargaining representative continues beyond the one-year period for purposes of extending the parties' duty to bargain. (Montebello Rose Co., supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at pp. 24–26, 29 [affirming ALRB's conclusion that a certified union continues to enjoy that status after the initial certification year expires].)⁷

Consequently, it has been held that once a union is certified as the bargaining representative of an employer's agricultural employees, the employer's duty to bargain with that union continues until the union is replaced or decertified through a subsequent election pursuant to sections 1156.3 or 1156.7. (Montebello Rose, supra, at pp. 23–24, 29 [approving statutory interpretation adopted by the Board in Kaplan's Fruit & Produce Co., Inc. (1977) 3 ALRB No. 28]; Adamek & Dessert, supra, 178 Cal.App.3d at p. 983; Bruce Church, Inc. (1991) 17 ALRB No. 1, p. 13 [stating principle adhered to by the Board that “a [u]nion remains the certified representative until decertified”]; Pictsweet Mushroom Farms (2003) 29 ALRB No. 3, p. 7 [same].)⁸

In summary, the ALRA recognizes, protects and promotes agricultural employees' right to collective bargaining (§ 1140.2) and, in the furtherance of that right, the ALRA requires the agricultural employer and the employees' certified representative to bargain collectively in good faith. (§§ 1153, subd. (e), 1154, subd. (c).) The ALRA defines the parties' mutual obligation to bargain collectively in good faith as follows: “[T]o bargain collectively in good faith is the performance of the mutual obligation of the agricultural employer and the representative of the agricultural employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any questions arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession.” (§ 1155.2, subd. (a).)

⁸ A third consequence of certification is that no CBA may be negotiated or entered by the employer with any other (not currently certified) labor organization. (§ 1153, subd. (f).) The ALRA further declares that only a certified labor organization may be a party to a legally valid CBA. (§ 1159.)

When an employer or labor organization fails to bargain in good faith as required, or when other unfair labor practices (as defined in the ALRA) have occurred, recourse to the Board is provided and the Board is empowered to issue orders or take remedial action to effectuate the purposes of the ALRA. (§§ 1160–1160.9; see, e.g., Harry Carian Sales v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (1985) 39 Cal.3d 209, 229–230 [discussing Board’s remedial authority relating to unfair labor practices].)

III. Abandonment

With the above statutory framework in mind, we now consider the issue of whether UFW’s lengthy absence and inactivity in this case created an abandonment defense to Fanucchi’s duty to bargain. We hold it did not.

We begin with the Board’s perspective on the issue. In its decision in the instant case, reported at Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, the Board explained its rejection of Fanucchi’s claim that UFW’s conduct provided a defense to bargaining:

“The Board’s previous decisions have been very clear that, under the ALRA, the fact that a labor organization has been inactive or absent, even for an extended period of time, does not represent a defense to the employer’s duty to bargain. (Dole Fresh Fruit Co., Inc. (1996) 22 ALRB No. 4; Pictsweet Mushroom Farms[, supra,] 29 ALRB No. 3; San Joaquin Tomato Growers, Inc. (2011) 37 ALRB No. 5.) The Board recently reaffirmed its holdings on abandonment and confirmed that, except in cases where the union disclaims interest in representing the bargaining unit or becomes defunct, the union remains certified [for purposes of the employer’s duty to bargain] until removed or replaced through the ALRA’s election procedures, regardless of any bargaining hiatus or union inactivity that may have occurred. (Arnaudo Brothers, LP (2014) 40 ALRB No. 3[.] pp. 9–12.) These principles stem from the legislative intent inherent in the ALRA that the power to select and remove unions as bargaining representatives should reside with agricultural employees and not with their employers. [Citation.] The facts alleged by [Fanucchi] fall squarely within this well-established rule.” (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, p. 8, fn. omitted.)

Additionally, in the same decision of this matter in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, the Board further explained that the principal remedy for such union failings—namely, a new election—is left in the hands of the agricultural employees:

“In cases where a union is failing to adequately carry out its duties as bargaining representative and employees’ appeals to the union itself are insufficient to resolve the situation, the remedy for such dereliction is for the members of the bargaining unit to seek to decertify the union or replace it with another union through the ALRA’s election procedures. Bargaining unit members may also, where appropriate, seek to enforce their union’s duty of fair representation. [Citation.] While these procedures are unavailable to the employer, it need not stand idly by if a certified union refuses to come to the bargaining table but may use the ALRA’s unfair labor practice procedures to assert a claim that a union is unlawfully refusing to bargain. [Citation.] Additionally, a union that fails to respond to changes to terms and conditions of employment proposed by the employer may be held to have waived its right to bargain over those changes, privileging the employer to implement them without bargaining. [Citation.] However, what the employer may not do is impose its own choice on employees by unilaterally determining that it will no longer bargain with the union. [¶] Accordingly, [Fanucchi’s] claim that it was not obligated to bargain with the UFW due to an alleged period of inactivity by the UFW does not represent a legally cognizable defense to the duty to bargain under the ALRA....” (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, pp. 8–9.)

The Board’s position (recited above) on the abandonment issue as it relates to the employer’s duty to bargain is consistent with how California appellate courts have construed the ALRA. An important principle recognized in the ALRA cases is that an employer’s duty to bargain with the originally certified union continues until that union is replaced or decertified by a subsequent election. (See Montebello Rose, supra, 119

Cal.App.3d at pp. 23–24 [“employer’s duty to bargain does not lapse after one year but continues until such time as the union is officially decertified as the employee bargaining representative”]; F&P Growers Assn. v. Agricultural Labor Relations Bd. (1985) 168 Cal.App.3d 667, 672 (F&P Growers) [“an employer’s duty to bargain does not lapse after one year even in the absence of an extension”]; Adamek & Dessert, supra, 178 Cal.App.3d at p. 983 [“the company has a duty to bargain with the union until the union is decertified through a second election”].) In accordance with this principle, if a certified union’s neglect or inaction causes the agricultural employees to be dissatisfied with that union, the appropriate remedy is for the employees to pursue a decertification election. (See, e.g., §§ 1156.3 & 1156.7; F&P Growers, supra, at pp. 674–678.) As one court put it, “So long as the employees can petition for a new election if they wish to remove the union, the employer has no real cause for concern about whether it is bargaining with the true representative of its employees.” (Montebello Rose Co., supra, at p. 28.)⁹

The case of F&P Growers sheds additional light on the issue before us. In F&P Growers, the employer refused to continue bargaining with the originally certified union in that case, the UFW, because allegedly “objective criteria revealed that a majority of employees in the bargaining unit no longer supported the UFW” (F&P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at p. 670.) The employer had argued that since the NLRA’s rebuttable presumption rule had been found applicable to the ALRA, other related NLRA precedents likewise should be adopted, including the rule allowing an employer to refuse to bargain with a certified union if the employer had a good faith belief that the union had lost its majority support. (F&P Growers, supra, at pp. 672–677.) In resolving that issue, the Court of Appeal concluded that the loss of majority support defense to bargaining with a particular union was clearly inapplicable to the ALRA because of important differences between the ALRA and the NLRA. (F&P Growers, supra, at pp. 674–676.) For example, the NLRA permitted an employer to bargain with a union that had demonstrated its majority status by means other than an election, but the ALRA only allowed an employer to bargain with a union that had won an election. Moreover, the NLRA permitted employers to petition for an election, but the ALRA did not allow employers to file election petitions regarding the certification or decertification of a union. (F&P Growers, supra, at pp. 674–678.) As noted in F&P Growers, these distinctive provisions of the ALRA indicated the Legislature did not intend for an agricultural employer to participate in deciding whether or not it shall bargain with a particular union. Such choice was left solely to the employees, and was removed from the employer. (F&P Growers, supra, at pp. 677–678.) For these reasons, the Court of Appeal held that employers could not refuse to bargain with a particular union based on a good faith belief in loss of majority status, since that would allow employers to do indirectly (i.e., effectively decertify a union) what the Legislature had removed from the employer’s purview. (Id. at p. 677.)

In the present case, Fanucchi’s assertion of abandonment as an alleged defense to its duty to bargain is clearly analogous to the loss of majority support defense that was asserted by the employer in F&P Growers. In both cases, the employer refused to bargain with a previously certified union based on a factual development that allegedly resulted in a defense to bargaining. As F&P Growers correctly held, the Legislature did not intend for an agricultural employer to participate in deciding whether or not it shall bargain with a particular union and, therefore, the employer in that case could not refuse to bargain with the certified union based on a claimed defense of loss of majority support. (See F&P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at pp. 677–678.) In light of the similar nature of the case at bench, we believe that the same reasoning applies and the same result should follow. Thus, here, Fanucchi was not entitled to refuse to bargain with UFW based on UFW's past failings or inactivity, and such conduct did not create a defense to bargaining, whether labeled as abandonment or otherwise.

Moreover, "[a] guiding principle for evaluating the Board's decision ... is that an administrative agency is entitled to strong deference when interpreting policy in its field of expertise" (Montebello Rose Co., supra, 119 Cal.App.3d at p. 24). Based on the foregoing analysis of the present issue, it is appropriate that we defer to the Board's resolution thereof. In implementing the ALRA and its policies, the Board held in the present case (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4), as it has held in previous Board decisions, that past union absence or inactivity do not create an abandonment defense to the duty to bargain. In light of existing judicial construction of the ALRA as reflected in the Court of Appeal decisions noted above, the Board's position on this issue constituted a reasonable interpretation and application of the ALRA. Accordingly, the Board's decision on that discrete issue is hereby affirmed. Since Fanucchi had no valid defense to the duty to bargain, it follows that its refusal to bargain with UFW or to provide information constituted unfair labor practices, as the Board further held. We affirm these latter findings as well.

IV. Related Equitable Defenses

For the same reasons set forth above regarding abandonment, the related equitable defenses premised on the same underlying facts—namely, UFW's failure to bargain for 24 years—likewise did not constitute defenses to the duty to bargain under the ALRA. In substance, these equitable defenses raised by Fanucchi (i.e., laches, unclean hands, and estoppel) were merely a reiteration under different labels of the same essential claim of abandonment. We affirm the Board's conclusion that UFW's past inactivity and/or absence did not create a defense to bargaining under these alternative equitable theories.

V. Make Whole Relief

We now consider whether make whole relief was appropriately ordered by the Board. We begin by providing a brief description of this unique remedy. If an employer is guilty of an unlawful labor practice for refusal to bargain in good faith, the Board has discretion under the ALRA to impose a make whole remedy against the employer to compensate the employees for losses incurred as a result of the delays in the collective bargaining process. (See J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at pp. 27, 36.) The purpose of the make whole remedy is to put the parties and the employees in the economic positions that they presumably would have been in if the employer had not unlawfully refused to bargain. (F&P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at p. 682.)

The statutory provision of the ALRA authorizing make whole relief is section 1160.3. Section 1160.3 provides in relevant part that whenever the Board finds an employer guilty of an unfair labor practice for refusal to bargain, the Board may enter an order “requiring such person to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, [and] to take affirmative action, including ... making employees whole, when the board deems such relief appropriate, for the loss of pay resulting from the employer’s refusal to bargain, and to provide such other relief as will effectuate the policies of this part.” (Italics added.) As the wording of the statute clearly indicates, make whole relief is discretionary in nature and is to be applied only where the Board determines it is appropriate under the circumstances. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at pp. 37–38; F&P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at pp. 680–682.)

In determining whether or not such relief is appropriate, the Board must consider the facts and equities of each particular case. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at pp. 37–38.) Thus, it is not permissible to impose make whole relief on a per se basis, such as by imposing it automatically whenever an employer is found to have committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain. (Ibid.) In F&P Growers, the Court of Appeal explained the implications in that case of this rule against per se relief: “[E]ven though the employer may have had no right to be involved in deciding whether it would or would not bargain with [UFW], the Board was still required to examine the employer's conduct for particular facts and circumstances to see if the make whole remedy was appropriate. The fact that we now hold that the employer was required to bargain with [UFW] regardless of its good faith belief does not negate the discretionary nature of the make whole relief under the statute.... Even though that belief is no defense for failure to bargain, the language of the statute is clear that the Board issue the make whole relief only when it 'deems' the relief appropriate." (F&P Growers, supra, 168 Cal.App.3d at p. 681.)

A special type of case in which the issue of make whole relief sometimes arises is where the employer has made a "technical' refusal to bargain" as a means of obtaining judicial review of the validity of a representation election. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 27.) In J.R. Norton Co., the Supreme Court considered the issue of make whole relief in the context of such a technical refusal to bargain. (Id. at pp. 27-40.) The court observed that the technical refusal to bargain procedure is necessary because election certification decisions by the Board are not subject to direct judicial review (id. at p. 27), and it is important to provide a check on arbitrary action by the Board in regard to representation elections (id. at p. 30). The court then discussed the standard to be applied by the Board regarding make whole relief in such cases. In particular, the court held that where an employer engages in a technical refusal to bargain but ultimately loses the election challenge after obtaining judicial review, the Board is required to evaluate whether to impose make whole relief under the following standard: "[T]he Board must determine from the totality of the employer's conduct whether it went through the motions of contesting the election results as an elaborate pretense to avoid bargaining or whether it litigated in a reasonable good faith belief that the union would not have been freely selected by the employees as their bargaining representative had the election been properly conducted. We emphasize that this holding does not imply that whenever the Board finds an employer has failed to present a prima facie case, and the finding is subsequently upheld by the courts, the Board may order make-whole relief. Such decision by hind-sight would impermissibly deter judicial review of close cases that raise important issues concerning whether the election was conducted in a manner that truly protected the employees' right of free choice." (Id. at p. 39.)¹⁰

In the case before us, contrary to Fanucchi's characterization of its actions, the refusal to bargain was not technical (in the J.R. Norton Co. sense) because the validity of the representation election and original certification of UFW based on that election were not at issue.

Where, as here, the employer's refusal to bargain was not technical, F&P Growers, provides an instructive analysis of the Board's generally followed approach to the issue of make whole relief in such cases.¹¹ In F&P Growers, the Board had adopted a particular standard for deciding on whether make whole relief was appropriate. That standard was as follows: "[W]e consider on a case-by-case basis the extent to which the public interest in the employer's position weighs against the harm done to the employees by its refusal to bargain. Unless litigation of the employer's position furthers the policies and purposes of the [ALRA], the employer, not the employees, should ultimately bear the financial risk of its choice to litigate rather than bargain." (F&P Growers, supra, at p. 682.) The Court of Appeal held that the above standard was a proper method for the Board to use in determining whether make whole relief was appropriate: "The Board

used its own standards in determining appropriateness of the remedy in this particular case, and this they were entitled to do.” (Id. at p. 682.) Nevertheless, in applying that standard as a framework for determining the appropriateness of the remedy, the Board still must reach its decision in a discretionary (not a per se) manner based on the facts and equities of the particular case. As the Court of Appeal stated: “Since the Board in the instant case did in fact examine the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and did not apply the make whole remedy per se or automatically, but applied it only after it exercised discretion and deemed that relief appropriate, the order herein was not an abuse of discretion.... [¶] The language of the Board’s decision shows that they knew they had to examine each case individually, and the language of their decision indicates that they examined the case on a case-by-case basis.” (Ibid.)

Here, the Board explicitly followed the standard that was approved in F&P Growers. The Board’s written decision stated as follows: “Here, because [Fanucchi] is not seeking review of a certification election, F&P Growers applies, rather than J.R. Norton. The issue, therefore, is whether the public interest in [Fanucchi’s] position outweighs the harm done to employees by its refusal to bargain. The position taken by [Fanucchi] is based principally on its contention the UFW forfeited its certification by abandoning the bargaining unit. As discussed above, this position is contrary to over 30 years of Board precedent holding that abandonment is not a defense to the duty to bargain. Accordingly, [Fanucchi’s] position cannot be said to further the policies and purposes of the ALRA. [Citation.] [¶] ... [¶] Based upon our review of the facts and circumstances and the equities of this case, we conclude, in agreement with the ALJ, that an award of makewhole is appropriate and that, under the circumstances presented in this case, ‘[Fanucchi], not the employees, should ultimately bear the financial risk of [Fanucchi’s] choice to litigate rather than bargain.’ [Citation.]” (Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, pp. 18, 20, fns. omitted.)

It is clear that the Board's decision to impose make whole relief was based solely on its legal evaluation or value judgment that Fanucchi's litigation of the abandonment issue herein—which was premised on UFW's 24 years of inactivity—did not further the policies and purposes of the ALRA. With all due deference to the Board regarding ALRA policy issues, we believe the Board was clearly wrong in its legal conclusion that Fanucchi's litigation efforts in this matter did not further the purposes and policies of the ALRA, as we now explain.

Although it is true that the Board's prior decisions stated that even "a prolonged period" of union absence or inactivity did not create an abandonment defense to the employer's duty to bargain (e.g., San Joaquin Tomato Growers, Inc., supra, 37 ALRB No. 5, p. 4; Pictsweet Mushroom Farms, supra, 29 ARLB No. 3, p. 14), no appellate court has (or had) decided that specific issue until, in this case, Fanucchi sought and obtained judicial review. Ultimately, it is the courts that must ascertain the intent of a statute so as to effectuate the purpose of the law. (J.R. Norton Co., supra, 26 Cal.3d at p. 29; Bodinson Mfg. Co. v. California E. Com., supra, 17 Cal.2d at p. 326 [the courts state the meaning of a statute finally and conclusively].) Moreover, notwithstanding the Board's prior decisions, we believe the question of how an appellate court would actually rule when confronted with the novel situation of such long-term union absence or egregious inactivity (i.e., 24 years) as alleged here was far from certain.¹² Additionally, the question of UFW abandonment (or apparent abandonment) of bargaining units is not an isolated incident limited to the present case, but apparently has been a recurring problem, as reflected by the Board's own cases and the cases before this court in which the issue has been raised. For all of these reasons, and despite the Board's prior attempts to summarily dispose of the issue, the question has remained to a significant degree unsettled and controversial. Against this larger backdrop, it is clear to us that judicial review of the issue was reasonably necessary and helpful to all parties concerned, including both unions and agricultural employers, for the beneficial purpose of clarifying and/or confirming the law. Therefore, Fanucchi's advancement of this litigation plainly furthered the broader purposes of the ALRA to promote greater stability in labor relations by obtaining an appellate decision on this important issue. Accordingly, we conclude that the Board prejudicially erred when it ordered make whole relief in this case, and that portion of the Board's order is hereby reversed.

VI. Other Issues Need Not Be Reached

In view of the fact that we have decided, as a matter of law, the question of the nonavailability of Fanucchi's abandonment-related defenses to the duty to bargain, and that we have further concluded, as a matter of law, that make whole relief was improper in this case, we find it unnecessary to address Fanucchi's remaining contentions. Those remaining contentions, largely dealing with procedural and due process issues would not—even if correct—change our disposition of the principal legal issues as indicated above or otherwise require a different outcome. We therefore do not reach those additional matters.

DISPOSITION

The portion of the Board's decision in Tri-Fanucchi Farms, supra, 40 ALRB No. 4, which imposed make whole relief against Fanucchi is reversed. The balance of the Board's decision is affirmed. Each party to bear its own costs.
